

An Autistic Teenager in Your Coaching / Activity

For sports coaches, PE teachers & activity leaders — supporting an autistic teenager (roughly ages 12–18).

The one idea

Autism, through monotropism, means a teen’s attention locks into a few deep, intense “tunnels.” Sport can be a lifeline at this age — a place of routine, mastery, friendship and recovery from the social drain of school — if the environment fits. This is the peak age for anxiety, depression and burnout, and many autistic teens mask heavily all day and arrive at training already depleted. Predictability, sensory kindness, clear roles and a coach who “gets it” can make your club the safest hour of their week.

What you may see — and what’s really going on

You may see...	What’s often happening
Exhausted, “can’t be bothered,” skips sessions	Probable burnout or depletion — not lack of commitment
Meltdown or shutdown at the whistle or after a loss	Involuntary response to overload; shame makes it worse
Intense focus on technique, stats or one event	Monotropic strength — a route to mastery and identity
Won’t join the team huddle or social after	High social load, not rudeness — give a defined role instead
Takes feedback literally; needs a moment to answer	Literal, single-channel communication + processing time

Try this

- Predictable structure and routine; warn before any change to drills, teams or fixtures.
- Show, then say; one instruction at a time; use video/whiteboard for tactics.
- Manage sensory load — quieter spaces, ear-defenders, warning before whistles/buzzers; offer individual options.
- Give a clear role and use the interest (the stat-lover keeps the book; the routine-lover leads the warm-up).
- Focus on mastery and relationship — a teen who trusts you will push through more; celebrate effort, not just results.
- Have an overload plan — an agreed quiet space and a signal to step out, no questions asked.

Avoid this

- Surprise changes, public criticism, or “tough love” that shames a shutdown.
- Forcing eye contact, team socials, or huddles with no opt-out.
- Equating a masked session or a withdrawal with “not trying.”

When to get more support

Watch for autistic burnout — exhaustion, loss of skills, reduced tolerance — and take it seriously; rest and reduced load are recovery, not weakness. Liaise with parents if you see crisis signs, and keep your club a low-demand, accepting space. High-quality friendship through sport is powerfully protective.

If the teen is a girl or marginalised gender

Camouflaging peaks here; a “quiet, capable, sociable-on-the-surface” teen may be running on empty. Watch for private collapse and check in literally and privately.

About this guide

AI-assisted, derived from this project's research drafts — Growing Up Monotropic (Part 4, sports & coaching), the Lifespan Practitioner & Health-Care guide (Part 3.3) and the Monotropism brief. Uses identity-first language. Informational — not a diagnostic tool. Fit it to the individual.

Key sources. Murray, Lesser & Lawson (2005); Murray, F. (2023); Michaud & Harvey (2025, physical-activity scoping review); Dwyer (2025); Raymaker et al. (2020, burnout). Full citations are in the source drafts.